2. Consideration to any waiting lists for rape and sexual violence support and mitigation.

It is widely accepted that the significant increase in sexual offences is mainly a result of increased public awareness and the confidence of victims to report. The additional demand on services has been considerable and discussion with local providers is regularly carried out to understand what can be done to ensure victim needs are met.

One way to mitigate against growing waiting lists is to provide additional resource but this is not something that can be sustained over the longer term as budgets are increasingly stretched. Recent discussions with Rape Crisis and other providers suggest that rather than place people on waiting lists for individual counselling, group therapy and support can provide useful emotional support until appropriate counselling can be accessed.
